SIMONS (P. Marcius) . Paris

Cupid and the Flowers

5 x 7¾

The last rays of the sun, setting in glowing splendour, illuminate a dark sky and a dark blue sea, and the sails of some little boats in the distance; and the towers and steeples of a fantastic city stand out black against his crimson orb. In a strange, marshy garden, Cupid has been disporting himself.

Wayward and cruel child, he finds amusement in breaking the flowers from their stems, in tearing their hearts open—and only leaves them to droop and die. At last he has come to the stately and tall lily—the royal flower, the noble flower, the emblem of purity. He would like to break her also, to tarnish her immaculate glory; to scatter her fair white petals in the mire . . . but an angel appears in a halo of light, and, with his flaming sword, protects her; whilst the little god of love, enraged and mortified, throws down his bow and arrows, trampling, in impotent anger, on all the other flowers around him.

The Bride's Farewell

15¼ x 19¼

In her gilded galera, led by the envoy of her future sovereign and spouse, the Princess, blest by papal hands, amidst the roar of cannon and the shouts of the multitude, quits the shores where happy girlhood has been passed, varied yet peaceful, as the course of the river, which flows so gaily onward to the sea. She goes to some unknown destiny, which God governs only, perchance to the fate of Mary Queen of Scots, or Anne of Boleyn. Amidst the gay pageantry, celestial figures hovering before her, unroll with shadowy hands, the prayer, "God speed the Bride to far-off shores, as happy a stream to wend."
